

Periscope Lesson 7

Balance, Blend & Touch

Having technical facility and proficiency on your instrument is only a portion of the equation. One of the joys and most satisfying practices of being a musician is getting to play with other musicians. The "give and take" that takes place when playing with other musicians is a very conversational process, and as many can attest, some conversations are just more pleasant than others.

Think of a one-sided conversation, when someone only talks and doesn't listen. We might describe this as "talking at" someone as opposed to "talking with" someone. Part of being a great conversationalist is listening just as much, if not more, than you speak.

The same goes for playing music with others. As musicians, we actually listen and play at the same time. We listen to ourselves and to the other musicians, so we can adjust accordingly. In this lesson, we discuss how to be a great musical "conversationalist" so you can play with anyone, and provide some exercises that can be used to unify the approach and sound of a line.

Special thanks to Devon for coming on for today's guest lesson! -Huei

Huei-Yuan Pan
Devon Koning

Balance & Blend

Center starts, add one player at a time from the inside out. Only continue if each entrance is perfectly timed, balanced, and blended. Once all players have entered, switch to the left hand, one player at a time. Same rules apply!

Touch Refer to show notes at hueiyuanpan.com/persicope/lesson6

FRAMEWORK

LAYER 1

LAYER 2

LAYER 3

LAYER 4

For free PDF downloads, video lessons, and additional resources, visit: hueiyuanpan.com/periscope
If the handouts or videos are helpful, please let me know with a comment on the lesson page, thanks!